

Alls Fair in Love and Weddings

Prudence Collier spent the better part of her reckless youth proving that she was not aptly named, and unfortunately she burned a few bridges in the process, including where her family is concerned. So when her long-estranged sister invites her to her destination wedding in the Virgin Islands, Prue leaps at the chance to mend at least one broken family relationship and prove that she's a changed person. Tucker Davies, on the other hand, has come to the islands for a very different reason: to stop the wedding. As a childhood friend of the groom, he has reason to believe that his friend is about to make a huge mistake and is intent on not letting that happen. One thing he didn't count on, though, was going up against Prue. Determined to make up for the past, Prue resolves to keep Tucker from interfering with her sister's happiness in the present and is willing to go to any lengths necessary to do so. Any. And if that requires a few tiny deceptions here and there, the occasional brush with the local authorities, and perhaps even instigating a barroom brawl, so be it. A sister has to do what a sister has to do. But so does a friend, and Tucker has no intention of backing down, no matter how aggravating or even to his surprise appealing Prudence Collier can be. The war is on, and neither side believes they can afford to surrender. Which is a shame, because they're both beginning to suspect surrendering would be a lot of fun
